Biological complications around osseointegrated implants are becoming more frequent. Peri-implantitis is an implant syndrome presenting progressive clinical attachment loss and progressive crestal bone recession. The primary etiology is associated with microbiological infection. A number of protocols have been suggested in the treatment of peri-implantitis. Nonsurgical procedures seem to be unsuccessful in resolving peri-implantitis lesions, while surgical procedures may create an access for treatment of the implant surface and correction of the bone defects by means of bone regenerative procedures. Unfortunately, no single surface treatment method (including chemical, mechanical or laser approach) seems to be effective in the decontamination of the implant surface. Moreover, the resolution of peri-implantitis following surgical treatment seems possible but the outcome of treatment should be influenced by the original implant surface characteristics and by the possibility of achieving complete defect debridement.
